International mechanisms for protecting Human Rights Defenders at risk for their work on land rights
Introduction

HRDs believe in the universality of human rights, seek the promotion and protection of civil and political rights as well as the promotion, protection and realization of economic, social and cultural rights, and must take only actions that are peaceful. (OHCHR, undated)

Human Rights Defender (HRD) is the term used to describe someone who, individually or with others, acts to promote and protect human rights. Although the work of Human Rights Defenders (HRDs) emanates directly from international human rights instruments, the first step to formally recognise the defence of human rights as a right in itself was given by the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1998, through the adoption of the Declaration on the Right and Responsibility of Individuals, Groups and Organs of Society to Promote and Protect Universally Recognized Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (known as the ‘Declaration on Human Rights Defenders’). This Declaration contains several norms enshrined in legally binding treaties, including the International Covenants on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR, 1966) and Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR, 1976).

HRDs are a highly heterogeneous group. According to Hina Jilani, former Special Representative of the UN Secretary General on the Situation of Human Rights Defenders, HRDs working on land rights and natural resources are the second most vulnerable group when it comes to danger of being killed because of their activities in the defence of human rights (A/HRC/4/37). The relevance of this group is confirmed by the current Special Rapporteur on the situation of Human Rights Defenders, Margaret Sekaggya, who in 2011 devoted a report to them on the basis of 106 cases of alleged violations acted upon by her mandate between 2006 and 2011 (A/HRC/19/55).

The role played by HRDs in land governance is affirmed in the Voluntary Guidelines on the Responsible Governance of Tenure of Land, Fisheries and Forests in the Context of National Food Security, which affirm that […] States should respect and protect the civil and political rights of defenders of human rights, including the human rights of peasants, indigenous peoples, fishers, pastoralists and rural workers, and should observe their human rights obligations when dealing with individuals and associations acting in defence of land, fisheries and forests (VGGT, 4.8). The International Land Coalition (ILC) frequently receives requests of solidarity from members in Africa, Asia and Latin America for or on behalf of HRDs working on land rights, especially activists. This infonote is meant to support their invaluable work with information on international protection mechanisms and organisations addressing human rights violations related to land.
Who are the Human Rights Defenders working on land rights?

Among HRDs, those who promote land rights for the poor are particularly vulnerable to abuse of power, harassment and violations of human rights enshrined in international human rights treaties. These defenders are often organised through grassroots organisations or movements, which face specific difficulties vis-à-vis state authorities and powerful non-state actors. Often, they come from minority groups or indigenous peoples, or live in remote areas. Many HRDs promote human rights within a professional or employment context, like as staff of NGOs or union representatives. Sometimes HRDs working on land rights come from intergovernmental organisations, or are government officials, civil servants, or members of the private sector.

What do Human Rights Defenders working on land rights do?

Who is right and who is wrong – does it make a difference?

[...] It is not essential for a human rights defender to be correct in his or her arguments to be a genuine defender. For example, a group of defenders may advocate for the right of a rural community to own the land they have lived on and farmed for several generations. They may conduct protests against private economic interests that claim to own all the land. They may or may not be correct about who owns the land in the area. However, whether or not they are legally correct is not relevant in determining whether they are genuine HRDs. The key issue is whether or not their concerns fall within the scope of human rights. (OHCHR: undated, 9)

Activities carried out by HRDs working on land rights are diverse, but tend to include:

- monitoring and journalism of activities such as unlawful and forced evictions or other land-related human rights violations;
- investigations/protests related to land deals/land grabbing, including local level land grabbing by family members and in-laws;
- grassroots campaigning, community organising, advocacy and mobilisation of public opinion on diverse issues: human rights violations related to land, forced evictions, commercial pressures on land, agrarian reform or land redistribution, recognition of legitimate tenure and territorial rights, participation in land governance, access to justice, implementation of human rights treaties, and other voluntary international instruments:

- representation of affected groups at local, national or international levels;
- participation in meetings of indigenous peoples or rights activists from other affected groups;
- participation in negotiations on land disputes (including as mediators);
- supporting victims of land grabbing/expropriation and of human rights violations related to land through counselling, paralegal and legal aid, and legal representation;
- working for reparation and land restitution, especially in post-conflict societies;
- land and human rights education and training, such as land literacy;
- actions to secure accountability and to end impunity;
- supporting better land governance and working at democratic transformation to increase participation in decision-making over land governance;
- contributing to the improvement of social, political and economic conditions of land users;
- contributing to the implementation of international land and human rights treaties and laws.

What violations do Human Rights Defenders working on land rights suffer from?

These include killings and attempted killings; attacks, assaults and ill-treatment; abduction and kidnapping; torture; excessive use of force during demonstrations; arrest and arbitrary detention; threats, death threats; intimidation, harassment; raids or unauthorised searches on HRDs homes or workplaces and property vandalism; stigmatisation, defamation, criminalisation; legislative, administrative and security measures limiting the scope in which HRDs operate, including by closing HRDs’ organisations and restricting their rights to freedom of expression, assembly or movement; confiscation, blocking access to internet and other communication facilities; freezing assets; forced displacement and confinement. Violations can be carried out by State authorities and non-State actors. Violations sometimes target members of defenders’ families. Women Human Rights Defenders (WHRDs) suffer particularly from gender-specific violations including social stigma, property grabbing, and rape, especially when their actions challenge gender stereotypes about women’s role in households, communities and societies at large. Risks increase in conflict and post-conflict societies.
Protection, support and solidarity for Human Rights Defenders

There are a number of globally or regionally active organisations specialised in providing protection and support, including through emergency grants, accompaniment and urgent appeals. In 2004, the European Union adopted the EU Guidelines on Human Rights Defenders. With these Guidelines, EU institutions and individual EU member States took the political commitment to support HRDs in third countries, through national embassies and EU delegations. The Guidelines identify practical ways to provide support, including through informal and formal dialogue with hosting governments, public statements, physical protection such as emergency visas, trial monitoring, visible recognition, financial support through EU programs such as the European Initiative for Democracy and Human Rights (EIDHR), support for the special procedures of the UN system and monitoring and reporting on the situation of HRDs. Similar guidelines have been adopted also by other countries. In 2007, Front Line Defenders published a useful handbook on this subject (What protection can EU and Norwegian Diplomatic Missions offer?).

Other Organisations
In addition, some organisations work on advocacy in support of HRDs. These organisations play a critical role in raising public awareness on the threats to HRDs, through action alerts, letters to governments, documenting human rights abuses, dialoguing with national and international human rights bodies and providing training. They are able to amplify opportunities of support for HRDs and help them to get in touch with local human rights organisations and protection mechanisms.

Defenders working on land and environmental issues are also highly exposed to attacks to their physical integrity, often by non-State actors, and many are killed because of their work on the environmental impact of extractive industries and development projects, or the right to land of indigenous peoples and minorities. The Americas seems to be the region where these defenders are most at risk.

States should give full recognition to the important work carried out by defenders working on land and environmental issues in trying to find a balance between economic development and respect of the environment, including the right to use land, natural wealth and resources, and the rights of certain groups, including indigenous peoples and minorities.

States should not tolerate the stigmatization of the work of these defenders by public officials or the media, particularly in context of social polarization, as this can foster a climate of intimidation and harassment which might encourage rejection and even violence against defenders.

States should combat impunity for attacks and violations against these defenders, particularly by non-State actors and those acting in collusion with them, by ensuring prompt and impartial investigations into allegations and appropriate redress and reparation to victims (Sekaggya, 2011: 123-126).

An effective way to raise the visibility of HRDs at risk and draw international attention to a human rights violation is to submit information to institutions holding a mandate of protecting HRDs and who can send urgent appeals or letters to governments.
